there are certain changes i want in the pormpt for the website. i want this color palette to be used in the website. bold introduction - design & manufacturing studio working for your brand. collaboration page - view collection page, a sleek magzine like catalog of our work. modern minimal and sleek

Absolutely — your updated direction is much sharper now: use this earthy neutral palette, lead with a bold introduction, and make the "View Collection" area feel like a sleek editorial catalog rather than a standard portfolio grid. The palette in your attachment reads as terracotta, soft sand, warm taupe, espresso brown, and deep dark brown, which is a strong fit for a modern minimal luxury studio identity.[1]

Updated brand prompt

A stronger prompt for the website would be: "Design a modern, minimal, sleek website for Endless Studios Amsterdam, a design and manufacturing studio working for brands, schools, sports teams, universities, and companies. Use a refined editorial aesthetic, bold typography, clean grid systems, spacious layouts, and a magazine-like presentation of work. The site should feel premium, calm, and highly professional."[1] [2]

That direction fits well with editorial-style website guidance that emphasizes bold typography, minimal layouts, strong readability, simple navigation, and visual clarity over decorative effects. One useful editorial principle is to rely mainly on typography, grid, images, and whitespace rather than extra textures or heavy visual noise.[2] [3]

Palette use

Your color palette should become the backbone of the interface, not just an accent. Based on the image, I'd treat the lighter sand and taupe tones as the main page surfaces, the terracotta as the signature brand accent, and the two dark browns as typography, navigation, buttons, and footer tones.[1]

A good application system would be:

- Background: soft sand.[1]
- Section alternates: warm taupe.[1]
- Primary accent: muted terracotta.[1]

- Headings and navigation: espresso brown.[1]
- Deep contrast areas, footer, overlays: darkest brown.[1]

This is consistent with minimal editorial design advice that favors restrained palettes and clear contrast for readability and elegance.[2]

Hero direction

Your hero should be much bolder and more direct than before. Instead of a soft intro, the opening should feel declarative and confident, with the phrase “Design & Manufacturing Studio Working for Your Brand” treated as the main visual statement.[2]

A refined hero structure could be:

- Eyebrow: Endless Studios Amsterdam.
- Headline: Design & Manufacturing Studio Working for Your Brand.
- Subtext: Custom products, apparel, merchandise, and branded production for schools, teams, universities, and companies.
- CTAs: View Collection / Start a Project.

That approach follows the same best-practice pattern of strong editorial headings plus clear navigation and easy user flow.[2]

Collection page

The “View Collection” page should not feel like a normal case studies page. It should feel closer to a digital magazine or lookbook, with large image-led layouts, varied rhythm, and enough whitespace to let each project breathe. Editorial portfolio inspiration consistently leans on spacious layouts, image-centered presentation, and a strong hierarchy rather than dense card grids.[4] [5]

For this page, I’d suggest:

- Full-bleed cover blocks for standout projects.
- Alternating image/text spreads like magazine pages.
- Sector tags such as Schools, Sports, University, Corporate.
- Minimal project titles with short one-line descriptors.
- Smooth filtering, but visually understated.
- Occasional quote or material detail blocks to break the rhythm.

Layout style

To keep it modern minimal and sleek, the page structure should avoid repetitive three-column marketing sections. Editorial website guidance points toward clarity, readable hierarchy, intuitive navigation, and mobile responsiveness rather than templated feature grids.[2]

So the layout language should be:

- Mostly left-aligned typography.
- Large margins and vertical breathing room.
- Sharp grid with asymmetry in selected sections.
- Very limited use of icons.
- No bright gradients, glowing effects, or generic SaaS visuals.

Typography feel

The typography should do a lot of the luxury work. For this kind of editorial studio site, a strong combination would be one elegant display face for headlines and a clean sans-serif for body text, because minimal editorial examples consistently rely on typography hierarchy and white space to create sophistication.[5] [2]

The tone should feel:

- Bold in headlines.
- Quiet in body copy.
- Sparse in wording.
- Confident rather than salesy.

Revised page map

With your changes, the main site structure could become:

Page	Role
Home	Bold brand introduction and immediate positioning. [1]
Collection	Editorial-style catalog of work with a magazine rhythm. [4] [2]
Collaboration	Explains how clients work with Endless Studios from brief to production. [2]
Services	Design, manufacturing, customization, sourcing, delivery. [2]
About	Brand story, studio point of view, Amsterdam identity. [1]
Contact	Inquiry and project brief form. [2]

Better prompt text

Here's a cleaner version of your prompt you can keep using:

"Create a sleek, modern, minimal website for Endless Studios Amsterdam. Use the attached earthy neutral palette with terracotta, sand, taupe, and deep brown tones. The homepage should open with a bold introduction: 'Design & Manufacturing Studio Working for Your Brand.' Include a Collaboration page and a 'View Collection' page designed like a refined magazine-style catalog of our work. The overall feeling should be premium, editorial, calm, and highly professional, with strong typography, spacious layout, and understated luxury." [1] [2]

If you want, I can now turn this into a full section-by-section homepage and collection page wireframe for Endless Studios Amsterdam.
